These three pieces of the Jackson tour — Integrated Solid Waste, Grand Teton National Park and Hole Food Rescue work together as county, federal and non profit agencies toward waste diversion and solid waste management goals. They have stories which tie together as they manage the unique geographic challenges and cultural climates of this area — from the high tide of tourist season, to the long, snowily stretches across mountains passes.

Teton County, Idaho spent $3 million closing the county landfill and creating the Teton County Transfer Station, now transporting waste to Circular Butte in Jefferson County. Working with these three factions of waste management — county, non profit and for profit — we'll talk about what works and what are we trying to make work as we dovetail our interests and best practices into serving a growing and diverse community that doesn't always embrace change.
